

The Philanthropist I Personally Know And Admire Is

The philanthropist I personally know and admire the most is my grandma. I admire her because of how much time, effort, and determination she has put into the people in our community. We have been working in our garden since I was a little girl, so we can donate our food to the senior center and neighbors around us. She would always tell me that what we were doing was for the better good when I started complaining. We still do this today because she cares about our community and wants to make sure everyone has extra food if they want it.

Another way my grandma is a philanthropist is by donated her money. I don't know how many times that I have seen her give our waiter or waitress our change from the bill and a ten dollar tip. When we go into gas stations, I see her put her pennies and dimes into the little donation buckets. When I was little, I wondered why she was so generous because I would have rather her bought me a new toy or coloring book than giving out her money. She explained to me that someone had it worse than we did and I didn't need another toy.

Another way my grandma is a philanthropist is by using her voice. When we have family or friends over, she will always bring up issues she feels need discussed or things she wants to fix. I have always thought she had a logical way to solve my problem. She is always trying to help people by giving them advice to help with their problems.

I admire my grandma for all these reasons and more. She is truly an amazing person and is always there for not only me, but the entire community. She has an amazing attitude and is an inspiration to me. My grandma makes being a philanthropist and a good person look easy and I hope to someday to follow in her footsteps.
