Philanthropy can be described in many different ways. To me, however, philanthropy is doing things for the good of others when it is not their job or your duty to do so. Thus, a philanthropist is someone who does those things. I don't know anyone who is more of a philanthropist than my dad. My dad is generous, kind, and loving toward others.

My dad's name is Nathan, and he is the pastor at Bethel Baptist Church in Fillmore, Indiana. There are many reasons I believe my dad is a philanthropist, but there is one that sticks out. Last year, in December, my dad went over to Aldi's. He decided that anyone and everyone who came through the store for 2 hours, he would pay for their groceries. And he did. He bought groceries for people who did need groceries and ones who didn't. To me, this shows an incredible amount of kindness and incredible love for people in general. There is one more example that stands out to me. Every year, my dad organizes a day he calls Serve Sunday where the entire church goes through Putnam County and helps clean up and help with things such as handiwork. He helps with a group during that too. The church will do things such as build new playgrounds for schools, help build ramps for people who need them at their homes, and more. This shows great generosity and care for others.

In conclusion, my dad is a philanthropist because he is kind, generous, and cares for others. This is seen by paying for others' groceries at Aldi's and helping organize a great event, like Serve Sunday.
